

This growth path starts with community-led early adopters and expands toward broader urban users who can make rental a recurring habit.

Today – Community-led early adopters

Core audience to understand and activate first

- Urban women already open to rental, resale, or sharing models
- Occasion-driven users looking for specific pieces without buying
- Style-conscious users attracted by curated wardrobes and unique items
- Early lenders and engaged community members willing to participate actively

In 12 months – C2C growth in France

Audience to consolidate in priority cities

- Users in major French cities with enough supply and demand density
- Renters returning for recurring occasions: weddings, parties, holidays, events
- Lenders motivated by visibility, trust, and wardrobe monetization
- Users who need reassurance before using the service repeatedly
- First brand-curious users exposed through targeted partnership experiments

3 years – Community-led model in Europe

Audience to scale without losing the core DNA

- Broader urban users adopting rental as part of everyday fashion habits
- New communities in selected European markets with similar usage patterns
- Strong local C2C groups built around trust, proximity, and style compatibility
- Users attracted by curated brand partnerships that support the model without replacing peer-to-peer exchange