

Hannah Dowler

The Controlled Minimalist

“I buy rarely, but I buy well. For an event, I might rent – but I don’t want to deal with logistics or risk. It has to be effortless and safe.”

Who she is

Hannah’s relationship with fashion has evolved from interest to control.

She no longer seeks novelty or accumulation – she has what she needs.

Her wardrobe is curated, stable, and intentional. Purchases are rare and considered, driven by function rather than desire.

She is not against new models like rental – but they must justify themselves.

Any added complexity immediately becomes a barrier.

Objectives

- Maintain a curated, high-quality wardrobe
- Avoid unnecessary purchases and cognitive overload
- Solve occasional needs without adding complexity
- Keep control over her belongings and decisions

Deep motivations

- Simplicity and control
- Efficiency in decision-making
- Preservation of value (financial and personal)
- Avoidance of unnecessary complexity

What would make her adopt

- Extremely simple, low-effort experience
- Strong protection mechanisms (insurance, guarantees)
- Clear, structured offer (no browsing overload)

Habits

- Shops infrequently, but invests in quality pieces
- Thinks in terms of needs, not impulses
- Occasionally sells items she no longer uses
- Uses digital platforms pragmatically, not habitually
- Prefers predictable, structured experiences

Frustrations

- Time-consuming processes (listing, shipping, coordination)
- Uncertainty around product condition or responsibility
- Poor quality visuals and lack of clarity
- Platforms that require too much engagement or effort

Sophie Laurent
The Occasion Seeker

I don’t need to own everything. I just need the right piece, at the right moment – without hassle.”

Who she is

Sophie approaches fashion pragmatically. She values looking right for the occasion – but without building a large wardrobe. She does not seek identity through fashion, nor simplicity for its own sake. She seeks efficiency: access instead of ownership. Rental naturally fits her logic – as long as it works like a service: reliable, fast, and frictionless.

Objectives

- Access the right outfit for specific occasions
- Avoid unnecessary purchases
- Optimize wardrobe usage without effort
- Save time while maintaining quality and style

Deep motivations

- Practicality and efficiency
- Time optimization
- Access over ownership
- Reliable outcomes with minimal effort

What would make her adopt

- Strong availability and precise search
- Clear, fast booking process
- Reliable delivery and cleaning
- Transparent information (fit, condition, reviews)

Habits

- Shops when needed (events, travel, specific looks)
- Uses or considers rental for one-off situations
- Compares options quickly and pragmatically
- Less interested in browsing, more in finding
- Treats platforms as services, not communities

Frustrations

- Difficulty finding the right item quickly
- Limited availability or poor filtering
- Unclear sizing, fit, or condition
- Complex or unreliable logistics

Nelly Andersson

The Expressive Explorer

“I dress based on how I feel. I love experimenting – but I need to be sure what I get matches what I saw.”

Who she is

For Nelly, fashion is a language.

She uses clothing to explore identity, mood, and aesthetics.

She is visually driven, curious, and constantly discovering – but not blindly.

She navigates platforms with a critical eye and a strong need for trust.

Community matters to her – but not any community. It must feel curated, credible, and aligned with her taste.

Objectives

- Express identity through diverse styles
- Experiment without over-consuming
- Discover new pieces and aesthetics easily
- Engage with inspiring, like-minded communities

Deep motivations

- Self-expression and creativity
- Exploration and discovery
- Belonging to a curated aesthetic environment
- Feeling in control of choices and outcomes

What would make her adopt

- High-quality, standardized visuals
- Strong trust signals (reviews, verification, history)
- Curated, style-driven discovery
- Seamless transition from inspiration to action

Habits

- Actively explores styles across platforms (Instagram, Pinterest, Vinted)
- Mixes second-hand, vintage, and unique pieces
- Evaluates listings carefully (photos, details, reviews)
- Saves, compares, and curates before deciding
- Uses platforms as both inspiration and transaction spaces

Frustrations

- Poor-quality or misleading photos
- Lack of transparency (materials, condition, fit)
- Inconsistent or unreliable listings
- Platforms that feel transactional but not inspiring

Hannah Dowler
The Controlled Minimalist

“I buy rarely, but I buy well. For an event, I might rent – but I don’t want to deal with logistics or risk. It has to be effortless and safe.”

Moment of friction
Evaluation: “Can I trust the item, the person and the platform enough to continue?”

Moment of anxiety
Use: “What if I damage it, or what if someone damages mine?”

Moment of recovery
Post-rental: “Was the service simple and protected enough to justify doing it again?”

Key takeaway : Hannah’s journey shows that adoption depends on reducing complexity and risk. She may consider rental, but only if WhereWear behaves like a controlled service: clear categories, strong trust signals, simple logistics, visible protection and no pressure to engage socially.

Nelly Andersson – Experience Map

Nelly Andersson

The Expressive Explorer

“Fashion is a way to express who I am – I want to explore, but I need to trust what I see.”

Moment of inspiration

Trigger / Discovery:

“Do I feel inspired enough to explore?”

Moment of doubt

Evaluation:

“Can I trust what I see and what I’ll receive?”

Moment of value

Use:

“Does this allow me to express myself the way I wanted?”

Key takeaway : Nelly’s journey shows that rental must balance inspiration and trust. She is naturally attracted to exploration and style, but adoption depends on whether the platform delivers a curated, reliable and visually consistent experience. Without trust and quality, inspiration alone is not enough to sustain engagement.
